men seldom disappear, as compared en. When they do go away it is geny because they are demented, and know not what they do. Sometimes disappear under circumstances which imusing after the matter is explained, young woman started downtown one noon and informed her people that would be buck by 6 o'cleck at the furthest. At noon the next day her lyes were terribly alarmed, descriptof her were given to the police and gorous search instituted for her. At lock that evening she walked blitchely n vigorous search instituted for her. At 6 o'clock that evening she walked blithely into the presence of her family and announced that she was hungry as a wolf and wanted to know if dinner was not almost ready. She was perfectly amazed at the reception accorded her, and explained that she had met an old school friend whom she had not seen for years the afternoon she went downtown and had accepted an invitation to take dinner with her and stay all night.

the afternoon she went downtown and had accepted an invitation to take dinner with her and stay all night.

She had sent word by telephone that she would not be back until the following evening at 6 o'clock, and had then settled herself down for a good visit. Inquiry at the drug store developed the fact that the looy who got the message had started out to deliver it, but had become tangied up in a racial controversy with a small Italian boy, and while scated astride him gruelling argument into him had been nabbed by a vigilant "copper." The excitement of this experience had driven the message completely out of his head, and by the time his friends had bailed him out he "had lost track" of everything else that had happened for a week back.

Of the boys who disappear there are two distinct types. First, the boy or boys who run away from home to light Indians or seek their fortunes, and, second, there are the small boys—the fearful and wonderful combinations of "little Lord Fauntleroys" or miniature jack tars who wander away from adoring mothers. For wilds-eyed and breatthess energy pothing can compare with a mother who has lost one of these, except a "tagger" robbed of its whelps. She storms at the stations like a troop of cavalry, and seldom if ever falls to find her boy. Boys generally run away in pairs, and very frequently two brothers will start out to seek their fortunes together. Of the hundreds who leave home in this way almost all come trailing bock again, and they are usually very glad to get back. Some of them, of course, are not heard from for many years, and when they do come home they furnish material for a nine days' wonder and a column of comment in the town paper. A peculiarity of the missing boys who are reported is that they are almost all of tender age, rauging from 5 to 8 years as a rule. They generally manage to reach other cities and are there overhauled and sent back home.

The most serious part of the search for missing people relates to the girls who wander away or who are entired from home. A good many of them follow theatrical companies and circuses, and the majority are from it to is years of age. Sisters often run away together, and girl chums will frequently leave their homes in cruples, and, in spite of the most untiring efforts to find them, are sometimes never seen or heard of again. On the hooks of the Central station, the descriptions of missing girls are often duplicated and especial attention called to the case by the inspector, and yet many still remain in the list.

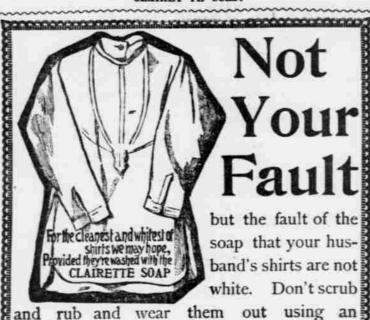

It a girl wishes to disguise her appearance it is comparatively easy, as it can be done by dying her hair or changing the style of her complexion from dark to light or light to dark, by wearing a wig and by other means. The disappearance of a girl is one of the cases which the department shakes its official head over, for the chances are very much against her when she is out among strangers, and she is fortunate if she gets back to her people safely.

There is one book which the officials keep under lock and key, for it contains the names of high society people who have disappeared, and very often they reaspear again, and hone but the officers at the central station are any the wiser. Sometimes they have been out on a little celebration and return home again in a day or two, and at other times they will be gone a week or more. At any tate their friends call on the authorities, and, while anxious that a diligent search be made, they are also anxious that no publicity be given to the matter.

A review of this book would doubtless furnish very interesting reading, but it is doubtful if it would subserve any public It a girl wishes to disguise her appearance

The proposition of the people of Utah to statuary hall at Washington as a representative citizen of that state brings to mind the fact that the president of the Mormon republic is numbered among the famous sons of Vermont.

Smith, Cowdery and Young finally drifted away to Western New York, and the Wood family emigrated to Ohio and settled near Cleveland. A descendant of this family became an eminent lawyer, who was for seventeen years chief justice of the supreme court of Ohio and four years governor of the state.

Spaulding, Young, Smith and Cowdery apparently were very much interested in the "Wood Rod Affair," but did not take part or become converts to the religious sect that were so firm believers in the power of the "divining rod," but afterward made it available in the establishment and promulgation of the Morroons, it is asserted, was written by Rev. S. B. Spaulding, who had some learning. It is said he wrote the "Book of Mormon" as a historical romance and burned the manuscript in the town of Manchester, N. The history of the "Latter Day Saints" is too familiar to need repetition. Smith came hear wrecking the church. At this juncture Brigham Young, who was an individual of indomitable will, by his cloquence, executive ability, shrewiness and zeal, soon made his influence felt, discarding many of the doctrines taught in the alleged Mormon Bible.

He resurrected the church, perfecting a further and new organization with the as-

The suggestion of placing Brigham Young's statue as a historic figure in the national statuary hall at the capitol has brought to the front these scraps of unwritten history in his career not generally known, although they have been incidentally alluded to by writers upon the history of, and in some of the works on, Mormonism, and more at length in Frisbie's history of Middletown, which met with rapid sale, and the edition was quickly exhausted.
